What is happiness? Dictionary.com explains it as the quality or state of being happy, good fortune, pleasure, contentment, or joy. I use to think happy meant laughing all the time or being in a state of excitement. I now know that happiness is a more quiet subdued feeling for me. I like the word contentment. I am content 98% of the time. What I know now is that what makes me happy and what makes you happy are two different things. Whatever puts a smile on your face is determined by you, and only you. That difference is what makes the world interesting.

Are you happy in your recovery? The book of Alcoholics Anonymous says we insist on enjoying life, page 132, and it says we are certain God wants us to be happy, joyous, and free, page 133. In new recovery it is sometimes hard to see how we’ll ever be happy. The wreckage of the past is staring us in the face and we don’t have our old behaviors to hide in, not if we are trying to live a healthy and sane life. So happiness can seem like a concept out of reach. The one saying I love more than Keep Coming Back is Don’t Give Up Before the Miracle. Most of the people who felt hopeless in new recovery today will tell you they are happy. Maybe not belly laughing, gut wrenching, fall out of your seat happy, but happy nonetheless. Today happiness looks more like contentment, serenity, love and freedom from chaos. Happiness is bills paid and money in the bank. It is a spouse who loves us and friends who respect us. It’s a job well done and a purpose in life. Today happiness is the complete love and understanding of the being that you are, and the soul you have. When you understand the purpose of and for your life, you will be content and therefore, happy. It’s a journey you don’t want to miss.

Cottonwood is a unique and life changing experience. Hope and happiness begin with the first step. Let Cottonwood help you begin the journey.

“Why Me and Why Now? Extended Care After Inpatient Treatment
by Eric Parrish MA, LPC

“What do you mean I need extended care” Macy exclaimed? This was Macy’s first meeting with her primary counselor to discuss her aftercare plan. She is 24 years old and finds herself going through inpatient treatment for a second time. Extended care had been mentioned her first treatment, but Macy was able to convince her counselor and family that she could stay sober. Macy represents approximately 70% of patients in primary treatment who are at high risk for relapse and should consider an extended care. Extended care provides individuals like Macy an opportunity to more fully accept and understand the nature of their struggles and to learn recovery skills without the time constraints of primary care.
What is Extended Care?

Extended care facilities serve as a bridge between inpatient treatment and a fully integrated life in recovery. Not all persons who complete inpatient treatment are prepared to utilize community resources or family supports to maintain sobriety. Although they may have some initial resolve to pursue recovery, they may be overwhelmed by complexities in life and their risk of relapse dramatically increases. In such cases, individuals return to inpatient treatment for the second, third, and even fourth time. Extended care is designed to give such persons the opportunity to be reintroduced to life at a slower pace; while developing insights into the barriers to recovery. Additionally, individuals learn more effective skills to use to counter relapse behaviors. (To learn about signs of relapse see The Phases and Warning Signs of Relapse by Terrence Gorski, Marlene Miller - June/1993). Primary treatment typically consist of a four to six week stay, while most extended care facilities offer a 90-day program, with some providing care extending longer than a year. Extended care utilizes treatment planning that builds on skills the individual developed during inpatient treatment, while employing a variety of treatment modalities to continue assisting in the development of new insights and a more effective recovery skill set.

Why It Works

The first time Macy left inpatient treatment she was motivated to stay sober and to return to her life as a college senior. Although she was highly motivated, Macy came face to face with the stress of life as a fulltime student coupled with escalating family conflict. Soon, Macy became depressed and hopeless. She became increasingly isolative, began engaging in relapse behaviors, and spiraling downward. Research suggests that the longer a person is in treatment, the better chance they have for a successful recovery. In fact, the Partnership For a Drug Free America sums it up this way: “To be sure, some people can quit drug use cold turkey, or they can quit after receiving treatment just one time at a rehabilitation facility. But most of those who abuse drugs require longer-term treatment and in many instances, repeated treatments.” Extended care builds on foundational assessments of primary treatment and allows for the development of new insights and skills for the next stage of recovery. There are two key reasons extended care works. First, reintegration is a gradual process and second, clients are offered the long-term support of Clinical Staff.

Slowing down the clients reintegration heightens the chances of successful recovery in many ways. Typically, people who enter primary inpatient treatment have tried everything else. At that point, the disease of addiction has resulted in despair and destruction, requiring that individuals start from the bottom and work to rebuild their lives. For most persons the addiction has festered for only a matter of months, and for some years. While the focus of primary treatment is to begin rebuilding torn lives, it also allows just enough time for a person to realize the effects of the disease in their overall life. In the best of scenarios, the patient finishes primary treatment with great self-awareness and more effective strategies to cope with life in the future. Extended care fosters opportunities to practice the skills they have developed by gradually reintroducing life stressors, while in the company of supportive staff and peers, and evaluating what is working and what is not working as it pertains to recovery. Extended care gives those in early recovery time to sharpen the skills they gained in primary treatment, obtain new skills, and most of all afford them the experience of integration within the community.

The long-term relationship the extended care client has with the clinical staff provides far more intensive support than any typical outpatient provider. With access to a variety of treatment approaches, extended care clients are able to participate in therapies that focus on mind, body, and spirit. Extended care also allows clients access to local 12-step meetings, addressing many issues common for those in early recovery. With a focus on the spiritual principles of recovery, extended care provides venues to integrate 12-step work in support of ongoing recovery, allowing clients to understand that recovery is a process an not an event.

Many people who complete inpatient treatment believe that it saved their lives. Extended care allows people to reclaim their life in ways that are meaningful, healthy, and filled with milestones of growth and spiritual development.
